Teachers as Learners

Teachers, as professional people, are always constantly evaluating and refining their craft. Our staff happily share ideas with in-service and out of school professional development. We encourage staff to make time to reflect on their teaching practices and to discuss these with other teachers. All staff work closely together for the betterment of the children. Our teachers and administrators are life-long learners, an important Paideia criterion.

In every Paideia school the principal or principals should function as the principal teachers. This provides good role-models and helps the principals remain child-focused and aware, not autocratic and distanced from education. Our school's two Co-Principals spend about 80% of their time actually teaching classes and are responsible for their home groups and subject areas, like other teaching staff.
